

SUPREME COURT OF CONNECTICUT

Poole v. City of Waterbury

266 Conn. 68 (2003) · Decided September 30, 2003

SUMMARY

The Connecticut Supreme Court considered whether retired Waterbury firefighters and widows had vested contractual rights to the specific medical benefits provided under collective bargaining agreements in effect when the firefighters retired. The court held that the plaintiffs had a vested right to medical benefits generally, but not to the specific indemnity plan then in effect, and therefore reversed the trial court's judgment granting injunctive relief.

CASE DETAILS

COURT	Supreme Court of Connecticut
WRITING FOR THE COURT	Katz, J.
JURISDICTION	Connecticut
DECIDED	September 30, 2003
DISPOSITION	reversed_and_remanded
PROCEDURAL POSTURE	Retired firefighters and widows sought injunctive relief and damages after the defendants converted them from traditional indemnity medical plans to a managed care plan. The Superior Court found a vested contractual right to the specific indemnity plan and ordered reinstatement. The defendants appealed; the Supreme Court of Connecticut transferred and consolidated the appeal.
STANDARD OF REVIEW	Contract interpretation based on definitive contract language is reviewed as a question of law; interpretation of an ambiguous contract based on extrinsic evidence is reviewed for clear error. The court also applied plenary review to the legal question whether a presumption favoring or disfavoring vesting should apply.
PRECEDENTIAL VALUE	Published Connecticut Supreme Court opinion; precedential

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether the retirees' right to medical benefits survived expiration of the collective bargaining agreements and therefore vested.
2. Whether the vested right encompassed the specific medical plan in effect when each retiree retired.
3. Whether the defendants' conversion from the traditional indemnity plan to a managed care plan violated the retirees' vested contractual right.

HOLDINGS

1. The collective bargaining agreements created a vested right to medical benefits generally that survived expiration of the agreements.
2. Neither a presumption against vesting nor a presumption in favor of vesting applies; courts must apply ordinary principles of contract interpretation.
3. The retirees did not have a vested right to the exact medical plan in effect at retirement.
4. The conversion did not violate the retirees' vested contractual right because the record did not establish that the managed care plan substantially reduced benefits or substantially increased costs for the retirees as a group.

KEY QUOTATIONS

"We conclude that, although the plaintiffs have a vested right to medical benefits generally, they do not have a vested right to the specific benefits prescribed in the collective bargaining agreement in effect at the time of the retirees' retirement." (71)

"Therefore, we reject both presumptions and conclude that the best course is to apply our well established principles of contract interpretation." (87)

"Accordingly, in order for the plaintiffs to prevail, they must demonstrate that the changes to their benefits are not substantially commensurate with the benefits provided under the agreements in effect at the time of the retirees' retirement, when viewing the group of plaintiffs as a whole." (105)

FACTUAL BACKGROUND

Waterbury and its firefighters' union entered a series of collective bargaining agreements providing medical benefits to retirees, including a traditional indemnity plan. After a state-created oversight board imposed a successor agreement during Waterbury's financial crisis, the city converted the retirees to a managed care plan with copayments, network restrictions, and utilization management. The trial court found that the retirees had a vested right to the specific indemnity plan, but the Supreme Court concluded that the agreements vested a right to medical benefits generally, not to an unalterable specific plan.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The plaintiffs filed an application for prejudgment remedy and a complaint in the Superior Court alleging breach of contract, ultra vires conduct, unconstitutional takings, and impairment of contract rights. After a hearing treated as both the temporary and permanent injunction hearing, the trial court ruled for the plaintiffs, finding a vested right to the specific pre-1999 indemnity plan and ordering reinstatement. The Supreme Court of Connecticut reversed and remanded with direction to render judgment for the defendants.
