QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether the complaint alleged a pattern of racketeering activity under the RICO statute.
2. Whether the 'investment use' rule applies to claims under 18 U.S.C. §1962(a), requiring injury from the investment or use of racketeering proceeds rather than from the predicate acts themselves.
3. Whether, under §1962(a), the 'person' charged with a violation must be separate and distinct from the 'enterprise.'

HOLDINGS

1. The allegations of a ten-year scheme to defraud multiple salesmen of commissions satisfy the pattern requirement under H.J. Inc. v. Northwestern Bell.
2. The 'investment use' rule is rejected; a plaintiff may recover under §1962(a) for injuries caused by the predicate racketeering acts, not only for injuries from the use or investment of the proceeds.
3. The person and enterprise need not be separate under §1962(a); they may be identical. The court overruled its prior holding in United States v. Computer Sciences Corp. to the extent it required distinctness for §1962(a).

KEY QUOTATIONS

"We are not persuaded that the statutory language supports the district court's holding." (at 15)

"We think the nature of the alleged activity, more than a ten-year scheme repeatedly to defraud up to 100 salesmen of earned commissions, satisfied both these requirements." (at 9)

"We therefore overrule this aspect of Computer Sciences and its progeny." (at 36)

FACTUAL BACKGROUND

John Busby was a sales representative for Crown Supply, Inc., paid on a commission basis. He alleged that for over ten years, Crown and its parent company, Hammermill Paper Co., operated a scheme to inflate the cost of goods in price books to reduce commissions, and later Hammermill solicited rebates from suppliers that were concealed from the salesmen, thereby reducing the commissions owed to Busby and approximately 100 other sales representatives.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The district court granted defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's RICO and state law claims. The court held that the allegations did not establish a pattern of racketeering activity, that plaintiff suffered no injury from a §1962(a) violation, and that the person-enterprise distinction under Computer Sciences might bar the claim. Plaintiff appealed.

REMAND INSTRUCTIONS

On remand, the district court shall proceed with the RICO claims and pendent state law claims. The constitutionality of RICO may be raised and litigated in the normal course.
