QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether the trial court erred by dismissing with prejudice a counterclaim alleging that the decedents' wills were invalid when the validity of those wills had already been finally adjudicated.
2. Whether the counterclaim remained independently viable merely because it was pleaded separately from the complaint.

HOLDINGS

1. A counterclaim seeking invalidation of wills may be dismissed when the wills' validity has already been finally adjudicated against the counterclaimant, because the counterclaimant no longer has a legal entitlement to the requested relief.
2. A counterclaim's separate pleading does not preserve an independent claim for relief when the substantive issue on which it is based has already been finally resolved.

KEY QUOTATIONS

“En caso de duda, debe requerirse al demandado que presente su caso.” (12)

“La desestimación de un caso como sanción, debe prevalecer únicamente en situaciones extremas” (13)

FACTUAL BACKGROUND

The plaintiffs sought a declaratory judgment validating the open wills of Lorenzo Terón Del Río and Ana Amelia Santiago Avilés. Ardín Terón Santiago challenged the wills as invalid and sought intestate succession through a counterclaim. After the trial court entered partial summary judgment validating the wills, and that ruling became final and was affirmed on review, the trial court dismissed the counterclaim with prejudice because its requested relief depended on invalidating the wills.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The appellees filed a declaratory-judgment action seeking validation of the wills of Lorenzo Terón Del Río and Ana Amelia Santiago Avilés. Terón Santiago filed an answer, counterclaim, and crossclaim alleging that the wills were invalid. The trial court granted partial summary judgment validating the wills; that ruling was affirmed by the Puerto Rico Court of Appeals and the Puerto Rico Supreme Court. The trial court later dismissed the counterclaim with prejudice because it was based on the already-adjudicated invalidity theory. The Court of Appeals affirmed that dismissal.
